Ammianus and the Written Past

Alan J. Ross

Introduction – the lonely historian?

Despite now being a cliché of Ammianean scholarship, the sobriquet the "lonely historian" may still seem appropriate for Ammianus within the context of this volume[1]. As a Greek writing a grand history of Rome in the late 380s, and (more importantly) in Latin, Ammianus appears to have few contemporaries who undertook a similar task. Although Greek historiography had continued to flourish throughout the third century in the hands of Dio and Dexippus, we know of no Latin author between Florus and Ammianus who engaged in a project of similar scope. Ammianus' Res Gestae is the last example of "grand" Latin historiography from Antiquity: he is not just "lonely" but also the "last". That is not to say historical works were not being written in Latin during the fourth century: we have the examples of Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and Festus, who each wrote condensed, brief overviews of Roman history, in Eutropius' case, covering history ab urbe condita to 364 AD in a mere seventy pages of the modern edition[2]. The absence of parallel, classicising historiographical accounts of the period that forms the extant portion of Ammianus' Res Gestae (the years 353-378 in eighteen books) renders the two themes of this volume particularly complicated. Which earlier historians could have been Ammianus' sources, and which his models? The sorts of historical text such as Aurelius Victor and Eutropius that provided parallel accounts for Ammianus (and thus might be thought of as potential "sources") were clearly not those he chose as models. The very scale and ambition of Ammianus' work places him a longer tradition of historiography that stretches back through Tacitus, Livy, and Sallust ultimately to Herodotus.

In the forty years since A. Momigliano first attached the concept of loneliness to Ammianus, scholarship has rehabilitated the historian from his imagined position of social and intellectual isolation as a historiographical outlier in the fourth century, and has emphasised particularly his connectivity with a Latin literary tradition. C. Fornara argued that Ammianus alluded to those earlier Latin historians, Sallust, Livy, and Tacitus,

1 The term was applied to Ammianus by Momigliano in an article of 1974.

2 For the text of Eutropius, see Santini's Teubner edition of 1992. For "breviary" history in general see Rohrbacher 2002, 42-63. To this list could also be added the lost historical work of Nicomachus Flavianus, the scope of which was no greater than that of the other "breviarists" of the period; Cameron 2011, 627-690.

throughout his work and in meaningful ways; indeed Fornara suggests that numerous elusive allusions allowed Ammianus to engage in a "subterranean dialogue" with these predecessors and to emphasise the continuity of his work within a tradition[3]. More recently G. Kelly has demonstrated Ammianus' extensive allusive engagement with Latin authors of multiple genres, ranging from epic to comedy to oratory, in the process revealing Ammianus' extensive knowledge of earlier Latin literature and his sophisticated engagement with those texts[4]. Ammianus, then, was placing his Res Gestae within a much wider literary tradition than just that of historiography.

Fornara's image of a "subterranean dialogue" is apt for the sort of literary engagements that have been studied in Latin poetry by the like of R. Thomas and have been more fully explored, in the case of Ammianus, by Kelly[5]. Allusion could be regarded as a hidden game, the solution to which adds a new layer of meaning to the "surface" meaning of the text. To be effective, this game must also involve the reader, who needs to be in a position first to identify the allusion to an earlier text (in other words, to be as well-read as the author) and then to grasp the implications of the allusion. I offer one example involving Livy: in his description of the handover of the Roman fortress of Nisibis in Mesopotamia to the Persians in 363, Ammianus alludes to Livy's description of the forced evacuation of Alba Longa in Book 1 of his history, specifically in the pitiable depiction of the civilian inhabitants forced to leave their homes[6]:

– Liv. 1.29.4: cum larem ac penates tectaque, in quibus natus quisque educatusque esset, relinquentes exirent, iam continens agmen migrantium inpleuerat uias*.*

"Then forth they went, abandoning their lares and penates, and the houses where they had been born and reared. And now the roads were filled with an unbroken procession of emigrants".

– Amm. 25.9.5-6: cum laceraret crines matrona, exsul fuganda laribus, in quibus nata erat et educata [...] exin uariae complentur uiae, qua quisque poterat dilabentium.

"The matron tore her hair, since she was to be sent into exile from her home in which she had been born and reared [...] Then the various roads were filled with people going wherever each could find refuge".

There is no obvious cue or marker to alert the reader that Ammianus draws on Livy here. Yet, the allusion, if recognised by the reader, forces a comparison with an earlier and seminal capture of a city (Alba Longa), whose defeat saw the expansion of the power of Rome under Tullus Hostilius. That comparison emphasises the reversal in Roman fortunes between the remote past of the early Republic and a far more recent event only a quarter century before Ammianus wrote[7]. The allusion, and the comparison it calls to mind, makes all the more poignant Ammianus' explicit interpretation that the surrender of Nisibis to the Persians is unprecedented in Roman history, by stating that "For never (I think) since the founding of our city can it be found after turning over the annals that any part of our territory has been yielded to an enemy by an emperor or a consul" (Amm. 25.9.9)[8].

As important as the analysis of Ammianus' allusions is to our understanding of his relationships with earlier historians, I do not propose to extend the study of this "subterranean dialogue" in this chapter, not least because recent studies of Ammianus' intertextuality have firmly rehabilitated his skills as a sophisticated Latin author who was in firm command of Latin classics, and not just historiography. Here I intend to study the related and no less important dialogue that Ammianus constructs with his past in the form of explicit authorial references to history, to other historical authors, and indeed to authors in the past whom he explicitly calls upon and uses within his text. In other words, my question is: what attitude does the primary narrator take to his past, both in written form and as past events?

Of course, there is an intertextual aspect to my study (particularly when a specific work can be identified as Ammianus' "source" at a moment when he openly refers to an earlier text or author), but my main approach is narratological. In so doing, I observe a distinction between Ammianus as the historical figure and author of the Res Gestae, and Ammianus as the primary narrator of the text, who may make explicit comments to his primary narratee (who in turn should be considered as distinct from the actual readers)[9]. How does Ammianus' narrator refer to past events, especially those that lie outside the chronological span of his history; how are they presented to the narratee; which characters are aware of the past within the text, or are even aware of the works of earlier historians? By asking such questions, we may discover how Ammianus intended his narrative to offer a discourse on its place within a literary tradition of historiography, and indeed how he may have wished his text to have been received by his readers. If Fornara was engaged in studying Ammianus' "subterranean dialogue" with the historiographical tradition, then here I study his explicit, "surface" dialogue. Ultimately, the comparison of these two dialogues may sharpen our understanding of Ammianus' attitude to his tradition.

Throughout this chapter, I also bear in mind those two competing forces that J. Marincola has identified as vital aspects of the ancient historiographer's claim to authority and his position within an historiographical tradition, namely imitatio and aemulatio: the imitation of the generic topoi or narratorial poses that predecessors had deployed and which together provide a definition of historiography as a genre; and also the competition (aemulatio) that a historian must engage in with specific predecessors (and especially those who have covered the same period or events) via which he may claim he that improves the accounts of earlier historians[10]. Writing in Late Antiquity, Ammianus had so many more predecessors than most of those predecessors themselves, and, as we have seen, he was not quite free of parallel historical accounts of the period about which he wrote. I also, then, seek to ask how these themes of imitatio and aemulatio play out between Ammianus' "surface" and "subterranean" dialogues with his predecessors.

How to write history

However Ammianus, the historical figure and author of the Res Gestae, actually went about composing his history, his primary narrator presents a clear depiction of how he wants the reader to imagine part of the process (Amm. 16.7.8):

> cui spadonum ueterum hunc [scil. Eutherium] comparare debeam, antiquitates replicando complures inuenire non potui.
> "In unrolling many records of the past, to see which of the eunuchs of old I ought to compare him [Eutherius], I could find none".

Throughout the Res Gestae eunuchs are consistently presented as court intriguers, who exert malign force upon emperors[11]. The one remarkable exception, according to Ammianus here, is the emperor Julian's chamberlain (praepositus sacri cubiculi) Eutherius who defends Julian, the hero of the text, from the attacks of Constantius and his courtiers. Clearly Ammianus admires Eutherius and his reference to the past is part of his praise of this contemporary figure: Eutherius exceeds the normal pattern of behaviour for eunuchs throughout antiquity. Furthermore, the way in which he is praised elsewhere at 16.7, as G. Kelly has remarked, perhaps speaks of his value as a historical source for the author of the Res Gestae: in the previous paragraph Ammianus says he possesses trustworthiness (fides) and a capable memory (immensum quantum memoria uigens), admirable qualities for any historian[12]. Indeed as both G. Kelly and T. D. Barnes before him have suggested, Ammianus may have known Eutherius in Rome and had relied on him for details of the slandering of Julian at Constantius' court[13]. Of additional interest to us, however, is the way that the narrator shows his historiographical practice at work: for him the past is a repository of comparanda ready and waiting to be used in order to critique more recent figures or events which fall within the purview of his narrative. The job of the historian is to sort through (replicare) evidence of the past, select appropriate comparanda, and arrive at a moralizing judgement via that comparison. In this case, the process fails to find a suitable comparandum, hence stressing the uniqueness of Eutherius (and perhaps reinforcing Ammianus' more stereotypical, negative depiction of eunuchs elsewhere in the narrative). Ammianus presents us with a persona of a historian who is scrupulous, investigative, and moralising.

Yet what exactly does Ammianus mean by antiquitates, the material of his research? As the object of replicare, they must be physical and tangible objects. Thus, as the source of exempla and comparanda, then, they do not just vaguely refer to the past but specifically to the written past. The point is confirmed a few sentences later (16.7.9):

uerum si forte scrupulosus quidam lector antiquitatum Menophilum, Mithridatis Pontici regis eunuchum, nobis opponat, hoc monitu recordetur nihil super eo relatum praeter id solum, quod in supremo discrimine gloriose monstrauit.

"If by chance a careful reader of *antiquitates should set against me Menophilus, the eunuch of king Mithridates of Pontus, let this be a reminder to him that nothing was recorded on Menophilus save this one fact, that in the supreme crisis he made a glorious showing".

The rest of the paragraph details how Menophilus saved Mithridates' daughter from being captured and humiliated by the Romans in 66 BC by slaying her then killing himself (perhaps not the most gloriosus action by modern standards, but one that evidently was admired by Republican Romans). Nonetheless, it is not the detail but the presentation that should concern us here: Ammianus makes clear that antiquitates are specifically written records of the past, and ones that a contemporary reader may reasonably be expected to be familiar with. Unfortunately, this not an instance where we can judge what Ammianus may have had in mind for his "source" – Menophilus appears in no other extant text, and so any intertextual interpretation is impossible (although, one commentator hypothesises that Menophilus may have appeared in a lost portion of Sallust's Histories[14]). But the very vagueness of antiquitates is telling: if writers have recorded the past before Ammianus, they are not named, and instead are conceived of as an anonymous group. We may detect an element of aemulatio in their appellation here, especially if an individual, such as Sallust, really does underlie the anonymous reference to antiquitates as E. Galletier suggested: Ammianus refuses to name an historiographical predecessor. This silence is not the only form of competition that is evident here. Ammianus' invocation of a scrupulosus lector is a sophisticated narratological technique that allows him to claim authority for his moralising judgement on Menophilus. This lector is conjured up by Ammianus only to be corrected, and thus helps Ammianus make two important points: firstly that scrupulous interrogation of the written past is how one should judge more recent events or individuals; and secondly that in this process Ammianus, the primary narrator, is the scrupulosior lector in comparison to the reader who has read of and calls to mind Menophilus. By inventing this debate with the imaginary lector scrupulosus Ammianus can emphasise his superior investigative skills and thus also exhibit his authority as a historian. The primary narrator's historical knowledge, derived from the action of replicare antiquitates, is superior to this imaginary lector's.

The technique of finding and utilising comparisons with the past is a hallmark of Ammianus' narrator. He points out that the antiquitatum ignari exaggerate the scale of the Roman disaster at Hadrianople at 378, and provides some counter-examples of barbarian invasions from the IInd century BC through to reign of Aurelian[15]. Once again, albeit more implicitly, Ammianus corrects (imagined) readers of ancient history. And in the aftermath of the emperor Julian's death in Persia, the Roman surrender of the Mesopotamian 15 Amm. 31.5.11 : "Those who are unacquainted with ancient records say (negant antiquitatum ignari) that the state was never before overspread by such a dark cloud of misfortune, but they are deceived by the horror of the recent ills which have overwhelmed them". stronghold of Nisibis is without parallel according to the narrator, who has scrutinised the past (annalibus replicatis)[16]. Such comparisons, then, tend towards extremes: either an event or a person is unprecedented, or, contrary to expectation, fits within an established pattern. Equally, the process of reading is frequently used to justify such historical comparisons: "we read" (legimus) or "have read" (legerimus), that emperors were saluted in a less ceremonial way before Diocletian's reign (15.5.18); that Cleander was a hateful prefect under Aurelian, and a figure to be compared to Procopius' father-in-law, Petronius in 364/365 (26.6.8); or that Hadrian was enflamed by the same fault as was Valentinian (30.8.10). The list could easily be extended[17], but what is evident is that Ammianus' explicit reading is confined to accounts of periods earlier than the time of the narrative where the comparison is being made[18].

Ammianus tacitly makes an assumption about the inherent reliability of antiquitates. They provide reliable material about the remote past with which to critique more contemporary periods effectively. Any flaw in drawing a moralising comparison (such as even a lector scrupulosus may make) is a result of being insufficiently well-read in antiquitates, not in the trustworthiness of the antiquitates themselves. A different assumption is made of a related term, uetustas, which otherwise seems to fulfil a similar role to antiquitates. An illustrative an example appears in the way the primary narrator engages with uetustas in a description of the Persian siege of the Roman city of Amida in 359, where Ammianus himself was among the Roman defenders (Amm. 19.8.11):

> "We saw (cernimus) far off a scattered band of Romans with cavalry standards, pursued by a great force of Persians; and we could not understand how they appeared so suddenly behind us as we went along. From this instance (quo exemplo), we believe (credimus) that the famous 'sons of earth' did not come forth from the bosom of the land, but were born with extraordinary swiftness — those socalled 'spartoi', who, because they were seen unexpectedly in sundry places, were thought to have sprung from the earth, since antiquity gave the matter a fabulous origin (uetustate rem fabulosius extollente)".

Ammianus uses a recent event (in 359) to correct a commonly held interpretation of a much more distant past occurrence (the origins of the Spartoi). Of course, the original source of this information need not be a work of history – the aetiology of the Spartans was as much 16 Amm. 25.9.9: "For never (I think) since the founding of our city can it be found after turning over the annals that any part of our territory has been yielded to an enemy by an emperor or a consul; but that not even the recovery of anything that had been lost was ever enough for the honour of a triumph, but only the increase of our dominions". Here, we can be sure of what Ammianus had read: in his description of earlier disasters he combines and adapts information from Valerius Maximus and Eutropius (Kelly 2008, 246-250). For the implications of Ammianus' use of the term annales when referring to a compilation and breuiarium see below "Surface and subterranean dialogues".

17 Further examples: 15.5.37; 16.5.4; 17.11.2.

18 Even though that earlier period may lie within the chronological scope of the Res Gestae: hence it is possible Cleander, for example, appeared in a lost book. We are perhaps led to assume that he did not, however, since in his narration of Procopius' rebellion in 364, Cleander is introduced with a reference to some un-named external text (legimus), rather than a cross-reference to an earlier point in Ammianus' narrative (as he commonly does elsewhere by use of phrases such as ut retulimus / narrauimus, uel sim.) In other words, the authority for the comparison here does not rely upon an earlier section of Ammianus' narrative.

Éléments sous droit d'auteur - © Ausonius Éditions février 2018 : embargo de 2 ans a topic for poets as writers of history[19] – but whatever text the author Ammianus may have in mind here, the primary narrator of the Res Gestae glosses over the specifics and labels it as uetustas in a similar procedure as we observed with antiquitates above. Vetustas, unlike antiquitates, is not taken as authoritative however; rather it is a source of information to be corrected by comparison to the present. The example at 19.8 is not alone – uetustas has supplied a false story about Persian judges (23.6.82) which the narrator corrects; and elsewhere is used specifically to refer to tales from mythology rather than past events (14.11.26; 22.2.3).

Here in Book 19, the primary narrator provides another complex depiction of the historian at work, and does so in a way that again reinforces Ammianus' authority via engagement with the distant past. As noted above, the primary narrator appears as a participant within the narrative of the siege of Amida[20]. Ammianus tells us he had been a protector domesticus (a senior staff officer) (15.5.22) and served under the general Ursicinus during part of the campaigning season of 359 (18.6.5-7.2; 18.8.1-19.8.5)[21]. He frames the Res Gestae as a whole with a concluding statement that it was written by a miles quondam (31.16.9). Such sustained appearance of first-person narrative in a work of Latin historiography is unparalleled[22]. Here at 19.8.11, I suggest, it performs a useful purpose in establishing the narrator's credibility. Ammianus may provide a glimpse of the deeds of that soldier on the ground in Roman Mespotamia during 359 (more than twenty years before he became the author of the Res Gestae), but he nonetheless also presents his earlier self as already a proto-historian: even when fending off Persian attackers, he pauses to use autopsy (cernimus) of his current situation to make historical judgements (quo exemplo […] credimus) and to critique the past (uetustas has recorded matters fabulosius). We should believe this quondam miles because throughout his career he had been following Herodotean technique of autopsy[23].

Judging the recent by the more distant past and vice versa are two of the most important ways that Ammianus engages with his past. As we have begun to notice, Ammianus' narrator is not precise about how he conceives of the written past, and at times the distinction between the past as simply the past rather than a written version of it is obscure. Thus far we have encountered antiquitates, annales and uetustas to refer to written testimonies and the past in general[24]. Within this list, however, there is a noticeable hierarchy: antiquitates are trustworthy, uetustas less so. But what does the narrator think he himself is creating with his written narrative? Terms such as antiquitates and uetustas, if they refer implicitly to texts, suggest these texts are temporarily remote from Ammianus' time of composition. No contemporary writer can write antiquitates; his works may only become antiquitates after the passing of time. What Ammianus writes is historia.

19 E.g. the story appears in Ov., Her., 6.32.

20 A phenomenon that has caused Paschoud 1999 to be extra suspicious about the narrative of the siege, which, he points out, draws implicit parallels with Troy.

21 For the literary role of Ammianus' "participative" narrative see Ivić 2004; Kelly 2008, 31-103; Ross 2014; 2015.

22 Marincola 1997, 79, 179.

23 Hdt. 2.29.1; 34.1; 3.115.2; 4.116.1. For autopsy as a prime historiographical tool see Schepens 1980.

24 A list also identified by Sabbah 1978, 65 n. 1. Sabbah was rather more interested in uncovering which authors might lie behind these oblique references (i.e. an intertextual interest) rather than how they fit together to form the narrator's discourse on the past.

In two methodological statements within the extant portion of the Res Gestae, the narrator refers to his creation of historia, and sets out his process as one akin to his treatment of antiquitates and uetustas. In a similar vein to the practice of selecting comparanda that we encountered above, the narrator defines his writing of historia as selective, and indeed, presents it as a process of excluding certain details. At the opening of Book 26 (an important structural point in the work, as the first book to carry the narrative forward after the death of Julian), the narrator proclaims that he will omit those things that are "not in accordance with the precepts of historia" (26.1.2: praeceptis historiae dissonantia), such as details of the emperor's dinner conversation or the location of minor forts. The sentiment is repeated in the next book, in which he refuses to explain (explicare) some minor battles because nec historiam producere per minutias ignobiles decet (27.2.11). History itself is a restrictive practice, and one which creates a narrative that is nobilis.

Brief yet telling apostrophes from the primary narrator to the primary narratee construct the text's relationship with the past (both in general, and as written accounts of the past), and define the style and purpose of his account of more contemporary history in Books 14-31. As the historian – the creator of historia – Ammianus is well-read, draws appropriate comparisons with the past, and scrutinises written accounts of the past in order to reach moralising judgements of more recent periods. In all these cases, we can observe an overarching objective for Ammianus to present his authoritative status as a writer of contemporary history: whatever his sources of information for contemporary history (a subject on which he remains largely silent, although those statements of participation reinforce claims to autopsy) he sets his historia within a longer tradition of writing the past.

Ammianus and the historians

If Ammianus the narrator seeks to write historia, he is not alone in his pursuit. On a few occasions other individuals are recognised as the writers of historia (rather than antiquitates or any other term), the same type of work that Ammianus himself composes. At 24.6.7 historia itself is credited as the source of an exemplum that is overcome by an episode narrated by Ammianus during Julian's invasion of Persia (historia miratur). Writers of history may not be specifically named there, but they are elsewhere, either as an anonymous group of scriptores historici (who are used as the source of information for the use of the "helepolis", a type of siege machine, by Demetrius Poliorcetes)[25] or by name in the case of Polybius (24.2.16: historiarum conditor) and Aurelius Victor (21.10.6: scriptor historicus). Both are explicitly labelled as historians, but we also find the historians Timagenes (15.9.2), Sallust (15.12.6), Herodotus (22.15.28) and Theopompus (22.9.7) named as figures who have produced texts that provide Ammianus with sources of information[26]. Of course there may have been 25 "In place of these devices of rams, which, because they are now so frequent, are in less esteem, a machine is made, well known to the historians (scriptoribus historicis), which we Greeks call helepolis. It was through the constant employment of this engine that Demetrius, the son of King Antigonus, after taking Rhodes and other cities gained the name of Poliorcetes".

26 Sabbah 1978, 65 also suggests Julius Caesar when Julian is said to follow Caesar's example of writing in his tent (25.2.3: ad aemulationem Caesaris Iulii quaedam sub pellibus scribens). I would suggest several more historical writers presented in similar ways in the lost books, but if this group is representative of the whole, then Ammianus apparently conceives of the writing of history as an overwhelmingly Greek pursuit. Indeed, the narrator emphasises Greek prestige in the field historiography with his invocation of Timagenes (during the digression on the geography and people of Gaul in Book 15) (15.9.2):

> ambigentes super origine prima Gallorum scriptores ueteres notitiam reliquere negotii semiplenam, sed postea Timagenes, et diligentia Graecus et lingua, haec, quae diu sunt ignorata, collegit ex multiplicibus libris. cuius fidem secuti obscuritate dimota eadem distincte docebimus et aperte.
> "The ancient writers, in doubt as to the earliest origin of the Gauls, have left an incomplete account of the matter, but later Timagenes, a true Greek in accuracy as well as language, collected out of various books these facts that had been long forgotten; which, following his authority, and avoiding any obscurity, I shall state clearly and plainly".

Ammianus presents Timagenes as sifting through various historical accounts here (as Ammianus himself had done for Eutherius), and making a judgement about what information to include. In this case, ethnic identity is the key to trusting Timagenes above all those other unnamed scriptores and their many libri. Why does Ammianus explain his methodology so explicitly here? Timagenes was a Greek historian who lived and worked in Rome in the late first-century BC[27]. As other scholars have frequently noted, Timagenes' ethnic identity as a Graecus is shared with the narrator himself, who labels himself as a Graecus in the authorial sphragis at the end of Book 31, in the same clause as he calls himself miles quondam (discussed above)[28]. To be a Graecus is to be a particularly skilled historian[29]. But Ammianus' point may be more specific than that: to be a Graecus is to be an especially skilled historian of Rome (we may note that although Timagenes is a Greek, he is still far better at researching "distant" Gaul than any other author, perhaps even Julius Caesar, another candidate for the source of this material). Of those few other named historians who are explicitly defined as historians, Polybius, the historiarum conditor (24.2.16) also fits neatly into this category of a Greek writer who is skilled at writing Roman history[30]. Timagenes and Polybius, Greek historians who write a history of Rome in the West, are ciphers for the narrator of the Res Gestae, whose authority is again reinforced through reference to these illustrious predecessors.

These (predominately Greek) historians are by no means the only writers who are mentioned by the narrator, nor the only written accounts of the past to be weighed up and judged in the way that we have become familiar with so far. In a digression on divinatory that on this occasion Caesar is not presented specifically as a writer of history (rather than merely a commander engaged in some sort of official writing).

30 With this reference to Polybius and Scipio, Ammianus makes an additional point here about his relationship with the emperor Julian: Ammianus plays Polybius to Julian's Scipio, in other words a Greek participant-historian to a Roman hero-general; Kelly 2008, 66; Ross 2016, 201. practices, Ammianus states that he has read the comic poet Menander (21.14.4); the ancient authors (ueteres) Meton, Euctemon, Hipparchus, and Archimedes are cited as the sources for the digression on intercalary days (26.1.8)[31]; as are Eratosthenes, Hecataeus and Ptolemy for the digression on the Black Sea (22.8.10); and Sophocles the tragoediarum scriptor is cited in Julian's death notice (25.4.2). Modern commentators have accused Ammianus of "name-dropping" on these occasions, and suggest that the digressions that follow show little use of their works, and thus that Ammianus the author had not actually read them[32]. So why does Ammianus the narrator mention them? An obvious reason is that they show off Ammianus' wide reading, and thus bolsters the narrator's identity as a scrupulosus lector[33]. But the distribution of such references is also telling about his attitude to earlier writers, and their discursive place within his narrative. Anonymous scriptores, ueteres, or simply uetustas are invoked as the sources of information in the digressions on Gaul (15.9.2; 11.4), earthquakes (17.7.9), Egypt (22.16.24), Persia (23.6.30) Thrace (27.4.2) and the Huns (31.2.1). Elsewhere, if such references do not appear in digressions proper, they nonetheless appear at moments of narrative pause, often when the narrator addresses the primary narratee directly, such as Gallus' and Valentinian's death notices (where uetustas supplies details of the goddess Fortuna at 14.11.26; and Graeci scriptores examples of moderate rulers at 30.8.4)[34], a brief explanation of place names (ueteres provide corroboration of Ammianus' etymology of Adiabena, 23.6.20), or his methodological statements (quidam ueterum support his point at 26.1.2). If such oblique references are designed to show off Ammianus' wide reading, they also implicitly establish the reliability and trustworthiness of those various earlier texts because the primary narrator relies on them as his sources. Ammianus indirectly praises his predecessors, whoever they may be. Nonetheless, Ammianus is thus very careful about constructing his literary hinterland: authors of all types, not just historians, provide an extensive tradition of texts with which Ammianus engages both to provide the sources for aspects of his narrative and to display his critical skills in sorting through such texts. But such "source" texts are also geographically and temporarily confined to the fringes of Ammianus' narrative. They provide information for geographical areas that are constructed as a remote and sufficiently "unknown" to require a formal digression; or events in the remote past, which feature in analepses, predominantly as the sources of ancient exempla to which recent events are compared. What Ammianus does not do is engage with contemporary authors on the recent events: in his core pursuit, he constructs his narratorial persona as a solitary historian, and even a solitary author.

Historians within the text

This discourse on the written past, which the primary narrator constructs in dialogue with the narratee, may authoritatively present Ammianus as the solitary continuator of an important literary heritage, but it also provides a tool to pass judgement on characters within the narrative. If the primary narrator openly endorses the reading of the past and applying that learning to an assessment of the present or recent past, do any characters exhibit the same skills? Certainly the opposite often seems to be the case. Valens' praetorian prefect Modestus, an uncouth figure, is criticised as possessing a subagreste ingenium nullius uetustatis lectionibus expolitum (30.4.2: "a boorish nature refined by no reading of the ancient writers"). Reading uetustas has a moral application in improving an individual's character[35]. It also has more practical application for emperors specifically.

The majority of the extant books of the Res Gestae trace the rise of Julian, initially in opposition to his senior-emperor and subsequent rival Constantius II during the years 355-361 (Books 15-21), then his sole rule, which culminated in his death while invading Persia in 363 (Books 22-25)[36]. Ammianus, with various degrees of subtlety, characterises Constantius as a suspicious and calculating opponent of Julian, and Julian as the principal hero of the entire work[37]. Both emperors' ability to read and utilize the written past plays a role in their characterisation.

Part of the chastisement of Constantius lies in his lack of awareness of the past: upon triumphantly entering Rome in 357 to celebrate victory over the usurper Magnentius, Constantius puts on an ostentatious display, "an inordinately long procession, banners stiff with gold" to which the narrator retorts that ignorans fortasse quosdam ueterum principum in pace quidem lictoribus fuisse contentos (16.10.2: "perhaps he did not know that some of our ancient commanders in time of peace were satisfied with the attendance of their lictors")[38]. Like Valens' prefect, he has not learned the lessons of the past. Yet, this does not prevent him from making arguments based on such reasoning. When exhorting this troops to begin a campaign against Julian, who had usurped in 360, Constantius makes a bold statement about the likely downfall of Julian and his supporters (21.13.13):

> '[Aequitatem] tumentes spiritus tamquam fauillas se <daturam> f<r>acturamque[39] deinde ut sceleste factorum ultricem et ipse expertus et docente antiquitate facile credo'.
> 'I readily believe from experience and the lessons of the past, Fortune will in the end, as the punisher of evil deeds, will take up and dash their proud spirits like ashes' [40].

Constantius by implication defines himself as doctus antiquitatis, and places his authority for this claim on his good judgement as a student of the past. The remainder of the narrative of Book 21 immediately proves his claim false: he dies of natural causes a few paragraphs 35 Tränkle 2008 has recently argued that this phrase should in fact be understood as applying to Valens not Modestus. If so, then Ammianus shows consistency in critiquing his emperors in terms of their education. The only one who is positively charaterised is Julian. Cf. den Boeft et al. 2015, 61-62. Valentinian is likewise criticised for being ignorant of and thus failing to imitate exempla multa [...] maiorum who could have offered models of pietas and humanitas (30.8.4).

later at 21.15, leaving Julian to become sole Augustus, unopposed and unpunished. The narrator's comments about Constantius' historical knowledge, coupled with Constantius' proclamation of just such knowledge in his final speech, cast an ironic pall over his demise. Perhaps if he had been better read, he would have been a more successful emperor.

In contrast to Constantius' affected claims to historical learning via antiquitates, Julian studied nostrarum externarumque rerum historiam multiformem (16.5.7: "the varied history of domestic and foreign affairs"), as the primary narrator openly states. We noted above that historia is what Ammianus writes; Julian is the only character in the Res Gestae who is depicted as aware of the genre and who actually reads it. Moreover, Ammianus hints that Julian can put such learning into practice. Upon receiving a report that the city of Aquileia in northern Italy has shut its gates to his troops in 361, he lets his reading guide his reaction (21.12.1):

> legensque et audiens hanc ciuitatem [Aquileiam] circumsessam quidem aliquotiens, numquam tamen excisam aut deditam impensiore studio sibi sociare uel fraude uel diuersis adulationum generibus, antequam maius oriretur aliquid, properabat.
> "he recalled reading and hearing that this city had indeed oftentimes been besieged, but yet had never been razed nor had ever surrendered. Therefore he hastened with the greater earnestness to win it to his side either by craft or by sundry kinds of flattery before any greater mischief could arise".

Of course, Ammianus does not explicitly state what author Julian may have read here, although military affairs such as sieges are the standard fare of historiography, and sieges of Aquileia specifically had featured in the histories of Herodian and Dio[41]. Again we may observe Ammianus' endorsement of the efficacy of reading historia whilst polemically avoiding naming any (comparatively recent) predecessors. Still, whoever Julian has been reading, his action is laudable because it is analogous to what the primary narrator advocates as the application of historical reading elsewhere in the narrative.

Julian's application of historical learning comes to a head during his disastrous Persian campaign of 363. This event inevitably posed a problem for Ammianus: if Julian was such a heroic and well-read leader, then why did he fail[42]? Two significant reasons can be exemplified through Julian's attitude to the past. In a speech designed to rouse his troops as they stood poised to leave Roman Mesopotamia and enter Persian territory, Julian seeks to encourage them with pertinent examples from the past (23.5.16):

> Contemplans maximis uiribus et alacritate uos uigere, fortissimi milites, contionari disposui docturus ratione multiplici non nunc primitus, ut maledici mussitant, Romanos penetrasse regna Persidis.

> "Seeing the great vigour and eagerness that animate you, my valiant soldiers, I have resolved to address you, in order to explain in full detail that this is not the first time – as some evil-minded men mutter – that the Romans have invaded the Persian kingdom".

Julian goes on to cite some examples of successful Roman invaders of Persia, and observes a distinction between the more distant and more recent past: his examples a uetustate include the Republican figures Lucullus, Pompey the Great, and Ventidius the legate of Marc Antony; whereas recens memoria has set forth the emperors Trajan, Verus, Severus and Gordian III[43]. He concludes by setting out various other enemies that Rome has destroyed in its more distant past, Carthage, Numantia, Fidenae, Falerii and Veii (23.5.20). All these examples, Julian states, ut antiquitatum peritus exposui (23.5.21: "I have set forth as one knowledgeable in ancient records").

Julian's pose here is remarkably similar to that of the primary narrator elsewhere: as someone who is antiquitatum peritus Julian draws upon examples of the past to judge his present. The alignment with the primary narrator is necessarily an endorsement of Julian (especially when he is contrasted with figures such as Modestus and even Constantius). And as a rhetorical exercise his speech appears to be a success in the short-term – his troops respond jubilantly (23.5.24). In the longer term, however, his positive interpretation is proved wrong. If Julian is presented as following the correct procedure in using history to understand the present, his historical interpretation is at fault: perhaps he should have thought of Roman generals who fared disastrously in Persia, such as Marc Antony himself (rather than Ventidius), and most famously Crassus (whom the primary narrator has recently called to mind only a few paragraphs earlier, by noting that Carrhae is "an ancient town, notorious for the disaster of the Crassi and the Roman army" (23.3.1: antiquum oppidum, Crassorum et Romani exercitus aerumnis insigne). Julian is to be commended for attempting to follow the procedure that the narrator himself uses, but his flawed understanding of Roman history provides an explanation for his failure in Persia[44].

Julian's speech is not the only point on the campaign where he draws on his knowledge of history. During his attempt to capture the Persian stronghold of Pirisabora, Julian personally leads a failed attack during which he is rebuffed and narrowly escapes more serious injury (24.2.16):

> euasit cum omnibus tamen paucis leuius uulneratis, ipse innoxius uerecundo rubore suffusus. Legerat enim Aemilianum Scipionem cum historiarum conditore Polybio, Megalopolitano Arcade, et triginta militibus portam Carthaginis impetu simili suffodisse.
> "After all, he got back with all his men; a few were slightly wounded, he himself was unhurt, but bore a blush of shame upon his face. For he had read that Scipio Aemilianus, accompanied by the historian Polybius of Megalopolis in Arcadia and thirty soldiers, had undermined a gate of Carthage in a like attack".

43 Julian's division between uetustas and recens memoria coincides with the starting point of the Res Gestae in 96 AD: Trajan, Verus, Severus and Gordian III must have appeared in a lost book, whereas Lucullus, Pompey the Great, and Ventidius fell before the beginning of the narrative a principatu Caesaris Neruae (31.16.9); Brok 1959, 64. This phenomenon brings Julian further in line with the narrator, for which see the next paragraph.

44 I have explored this episode in more depth in Ross 2016, 189-201.

Julian chastises himself for failing to live up to an example from the past, and an example (it is strongly implied) that he has read about in a work of historia. His reading and understanding of history was not enough to suppress his rashness and lack of caution, a trait (25.3.6: cauendi immemor) that is ultimately responsible for his death in the following book, stabbed by an unknown soldier's spear when he had rushed unarmed into a skirmish with Persian troops.

Julian is presented as a sympathetic character because he tries to learn and apply the lessons of history; his failure in Persia is to be understood in terms of his failure of historical interpretation, and in allowing his rashness to hinder his historically-based judgement. Unlike Constantius, the doctrinarum diligens affectator (21.16.4) he is at least a serious student of the past.

Surface and subterranean dialogues

The primary narrator of the Res Gestae constructs a careful discourse on the written past: he shows himself aware of a broad literary hinterland comprised of poets, rhetoricians, and mathematicians as well as historians (although those historians, if named, are predominately Greek). Reading such works (especially historians), and selecting appropriate information or comparanda from the past are important for judging the more recent events that make up Ammianus' narrative. Some characters within the narrative are subtly praised for applying the narrator's practice themselves (especially Julian), and one may wonder whether they are intended to provide a didactic example to the actual readers of the Res Gestae themselves: Ammianus' work will provide us with historical reading material and therefore comparanda that we should use for moralizing purposes in a similar way to the narrator and these characters who follow his lead. Furthermore, the subtle promotion of Greek historians of Rome within the narrative reinforces Ammianus' status the same type of historian.

This "surface dialogue" with the written past is largely positive. Ammianus sets himself in a long tradition of writing, and especially of Greek historical writing on Roman subjects and for Roman audiences. He gains authority through this sort imitatio and also endorses the validity and use of ancient texts and previous historians. Though, we may pause on the fact that the majority of these earlier texts are introduced anonymously (antiquitates, uetustas, annales), rather than as named authors. Such elusive references to other ancient texts perhaps understandably have acted as an invitation for modern scholars (particularly Latinists and Hellenists) to test Ammianus' claims and search out intertextual relationships between the Res Gestae and the works of specific earlier authors. If we compare their results with our discussions here, we may gain further insights into Ammianus' conception of his relationship with the historical tradition. An illustrative example comes from the geographical digression on Egypt and the coast of North Africa:

> Amm. 22.16.4: Id autem notum est, ut annales ueteres monstrant, quod Aegyptus omnis sub amicis erat antea regibus*, sed superatis apud Actium bello nauali* Antonio et Cleopatra prouinciae nomen accepit ab Octauiano Augusto possessa. Aridiorem Libyam supremo Apionos regis consecuti sumus arbitrio, Cyrenas cum residuis ciuitatibus Libyae Pentapoleos Ptolemaei liberalitate suscepimus*.*

Éléments sous droit d'auteur - © Ausonius Éditions février 2018 : embargo de 2 ans

"Moreover, it is a well-known fact, as the ancient annals show, that all Egypt was formerly ruled by their ancestral kings; but after Antony and Cleopatra were vanquished in the sea-fight at Actium, the country fell into the power of Octavianus Augustus and received the name of a province. We acquired the dryer part of Libya by the last will of King Apion; we received Cyrene, with the remaining cities of Libya-Pentapolis, through the generosity of Ptolemy".

Fest. 13.2: Cyrenas cum ceteris ciuitatibus Libyae Pentapolis Ptolomaei Antiquioris liberalitate suscepimus. Libyam supremo Appionis regis arbitrio sumus adsecuti. Aegyptus omnis sub amicis regibus fuerat*, sed uicta cum* Antonio Cleopatra prouinciae formam Octauiani Caesaris Augusti temporibus accepit*.*

"Cyrene, together with the other cities of Libya's Pentapolis, were obtained through the liberality of an older Ptolemy. We acquired Libya after the mastery of King Appion had been suppressed. All Egypt had been subject to friendly kings, but, when Cleopatra, together with Antonius, had been conquered, in the times of Octavianus Caesar Augustus she took the form of a province" (transl. Banchich & Meka).

Here we can be quite certain what text Ammianus read and relied upon for his information about Egypt and Cyrene – the parallels with Festus' Breuiarum are unmistakeable. Ammianus may have reversed the order of information, beginning with Egypt and then moving westwards along the north African coast to Cyrene, but the text is taken from Festus almost unchanged[45]. Festus' Breuiarium is a short work outlining how Rome acquired each of its provinces before offering a summary of Romano-Persian conflict. It was written for (and apparently commissioned by) the Emperor Valens around 370, to provide a handy guide for the emperor who was contemplating a Persian campaign of his own[46]. The way in which Ammianus introduces the information on north Africa is all the more remarkable. Festus' Breuiarium could scarcely qualify to be described as annales ueteres: short, and written barely twenty years before the Res Gestae. This is not the only occasion when we can detect recent, breviary works or compilations behind Ammianus' references to older grander (and unnamed) texts. Festus was a favourite source. Details of Thracian tribes are taken from Fest. 9.1, and yet are introduced ut antiquitas docet (27.4.4). Julian's speech upon entering Persia (23.5), discussed above, performs the same sort function as Festus' Breuiarium (an overview of Romano-Persian conflict to justify a new campaign), and Julian had described himself there as antiquitatum peritus[47]. Similarly, when the narrator claims that the surrender Nisibis in 363 has no parallel, annalibus replicatis, Ammianus alludes to Festus' contemporary, Eutropius, as well as Valerius Maximus[48]. As G. Kelly has noted, such phrases as annales and antiquitates elevate Ammianus' banal sources[49]. We may also note that they disguise their authors' identity: by refusing to name Eutropius, Festus and Valerius Maximus (unlike Polybius and Timagenes), the narrator engages in aemulatio with more recent practitioners of historical writing. If the reader identifies such allusions, and also recognises the discourse on the written past presented by the primary narrator to the primary narratee, only then may (s)he comprehend the complex relationship that Ammianus has with his predecessors. The surface dialogue promotes imitatio, the subterranean reveals aemulatio.

Ammianus may be the last great writer of historiography in Latin whose work has survived from Antiquity, but he was fully aware of the importance of the literary traditions in which he wrote. He openly advertises the fact that historia, such as he writes, has an important role in making sense of contemporary periods; and the depiction of the uses to which historia is put within the text suggests that he expects successors in future generations to do the same with the Res Gestae. His careful presentation of this discourse on the written past nonetheless also reveals that he models himself on his predecessors in a different way: polemic lies just below the surface, and occasionally past accounts are to be corrected. This tension between imitatio and aemulatio is the sign of vitality in the historiographical tradition in the hands of its last proponent in Latin.
